

Riddle for place 1:

Saffron and stone, bells and silence. A guardian of impossible strength stands where this campus began — not in a classroom, not in a corridor, but at a threshold the campus was built around. Something that measures what you are spending right now rests near the oldest presence on these grounds.

Riddle for place 2:

Find the place where things arrange themselves around a single point of resolve. Around it — the upright ones, silent and still. One among them bears a deliberate mark. Something long and rigid, leaning or standing where it should not logically be, is the artifact you want.

Riddle for place 3:

Find the seam where the campus meets the road — where a striped arm rises and falls without judgment, without pause. Near the place of perpetual crossing, something small and pocket-sized sits in the zone of observation, filled with pages that record nothing about you. Yet.

Riddle for place 4:

Go where trays slide and transactions of hunger close. The Architect left nothing edible here. He left something metallic — small, toothed, and deeply misplaced. It is near where something is exchanged. It opens a door that is nowhere on these grounds. Find the misplaced key.

Riddle for place 5:

An iron leviathan that has not moved in years sits in the open, hiding in plain sight. Near it — in its shadow or at its feet — something that belongs in a classroom has wandered very far from home. It erases. It is carried by no one. It is waiting.

Riddle for place 6:

Find the building where muscle meets medicine — where people push themselves until something hurts, and then walk next door to fix it. The Architect's final artifact is coiled, silent, and entirely out of place here. It was once designed to carry sound. It carries nothing now. Find the dead signal.
